

New Resources

Another paper in our series “Christ Among the ‘Gods’” was published in June this year. It is, for now, the last in a set of papers that aims to help us engage with people of different religions, and shows how an attitude of humble faithfulness will enable us to share the good news about Jesus without being silenced by contemporary “tolerance”.

The first part of a new series “Information and Communication Technology” presents some sobering data about how Australians engage with social media, and challenges us to guard how we spend our time and to be wise in how we use technology for the growth of God’s kingdom.

We’ve also published a short book that explores the relationship between “Atheism, Science and Christianity”. This book shows that a Christian view of creation is the proper foundation for scientific endeavour and that “doing science” is part of God’s good plan for us.

All of these new resources are available as PDFs on the GS&C website. “Atheism, Science and Christianity” is also available in formats suitable for reading on digital devices. Visit our website:

New Committee members

We have two new members on our Committee. Warren Chan was appointed by Assembly in July. Warren is a litigation lawyer who is also studying at Moore Theological College. He is married to Kiu Fei, and is a member of Gracepoint Presbyterian Church in Lidcombe. Kirsten Chan has joined the Committee as a Special Member. She is an in-house lawyer at a listed property and construction company, is married to Christian, and is a member of Chatswood Presbyterian Church.

Law and Religion in Australia

Associate Professor Neil Foster joined us at our July Committee meeting to share some thoughts about his work and the importance of teaching law students about their need to understand “religion” if they want to be good practitioners of “law”.

Neil blogs about current issues in law and religion, bringing his legal and theological expertise to bear on contemporary issues. Visit his website and subscribe for regular updates.
